Major Fladger, the those womanly virtues of which the "conductor pro tem.," is certainly one of the most graceful, polished, agree- which it stands so much in need.

There is a curious impression about that all ungraceful and unbecoming fashions are "sensible;" at any rate they are called so; and to dress sensiolylis therefore with many synonymous with dressing in a manner repugnant to their feelings as well as their tastes. For example, shoulder-straps are to some as great an annovance as corsets. Holding the most delicate part of the body as in a vice, forcing upon it the whole weight of underclothing, they become most disagreeable and painful and wear upon the nerves as well as the flesh in a way that is neither healthful nor pleasurable; yet because they shift the weight to another part of the body, a part not nearly so well able to bear it as the hips, universally called "sensible.

Those fashions are sensible which are best adapted to their purpose; and the upon the hips, is to reduce the advoirdupois of the clothing, not remove it to the shoulders, which among Amer can women are ill able to bear an additional burden.

At present, however, there is no necessity for any sensible woman to be burdened or troubled with clothing. The dress of women to-day is as well adapted to their needs—if they choose to make it so—as it is ever likely to be; and if they indulge in extravation be; and if they indulge in extravation cancies or conform to absurdities, it is conformation by word.
